OF SLANDER.

A Correſpondent endeavours to ſhew by Example (ſince that is generally more prevalent than Argument) that Slanderers are the moſt fooliſh, as well as the moſt dangerous and troubleſome Creatures. To this End he places his Scene over a Tea-Table, where three Ladies, two of them Viſitors, being met, fell immediately on the Characters of ſome of their Neighbours and Acquaintance, and ſpent all their Time in paſſing Cenſures upon them. They did not all agree in what was ſaid againſt every one, but all agreed in the vile Practice of Slander, and defaming every one in their Turns. The Daughter of the Lady of the Houſe, who was alſo preſent, was wiſer and better than all the other three; who having not once interpoſed in the Converſation, was asked at laſt, what ſhe ſaid to all this? I can only ſay, replied ſhe, ſmiling, that you have rendered our Tea-Table what the Men generally call it. Why, Madam, ſays one of them, if a little Converſation did not give every Diſh a Reliſh, People would ſoon be weary of it. The young Lady anſwered, really Madam your Diſcourſe makes rather Punch than Tea of it; you mix your Sour and Sweet together: And then mentioned Septimus as a Perſon who would never agree with them; who being preſently reproached as Ill-natured, ſhe proceeded thus; Whatever you know of him, this I am certain of, that if he was preſent, he would tell you, that he would give you Leave with all your Malice to take him to pieces, if you will firſt diſpiece yourſelf. Or to ſpeak plainly, he aſſerts, that all that pretend to critiſe upon their Neighbour, ſhould firſt ſtrictly examine their own Breaſts, and ſee whether they have not the ſame or greater Faults than they find in others. He will tell People indeed very freely of their Faults: But does he ever make thoſe Faults before he tells them? Or does he tell them to any but to thoſe in whoſe Power it is to reform them? does he promulge them behind their Backs? No, his Notions of Slander are ſo juſt, and he abhors it ſo much, that I have heard him lament there was not in our Laws a Puniſhment adequate to the Crime. For, ſays he, Reputation is ſo tender a Flower, that if once cropt or blaſted, it is out of the Power of the moſt benign Sun or genial Showers to reſtore it to its original Beauty. If ſo, how tender ſhould every one be, not only of ſpeaking, but even of encouraging the buſy Tongues and malicious Speeches of Defamers! For if Defamation be a Murdreſs of the Reputation; as in other Murders, every Byſtander ought to be looked upon as a Principal; ſince the Law allows of no Accomplices in Crimes of that black Nature.
